Just right!

By Heidi Keifer

My daughter really enjoys Life of Fred math and even I fell in love with it. I read that it was great for gifted students AND students with learning disabilities. My daughter is both. It's been great for us.

The explanations are short and simple. There is no need to teach the same thing a dozen different ways. They get it the first time. There is not a lot of repetition, but there is some review to keep the students from forgetting what they have previously learned.

The best thing about this series is that they can be completely independent with it. My daughter tends to want me to spoon feed her lessons, but actually begged to do math so much that I couldn't keep up with her (since I do have a life, too.) She finally picked up the book and started working independently. For us, this is a miracle.

We have several friends using the program as well. The Life of Fred draws in kids who are more language oriented or socially oriented. They are interested enough in the humorous story to put up with the "boring" part of math and never feel bored. Those who are already mathematical really enjoy the program, too, because it doesn't hold them back--they can fly into deeper challenges.

For those who need lots of repetition, there are bridges at the end of every five chapters or so. The bridge tests make sure they have mastered previous work and haven't forgotten it. If they don't get an A on the bridge, there are four more to do. This would provide the most repetition I can imagine anyone could possibly need. But if they wanted more, they have the option of buying the companion work book. We have never needed the companion books but I have read they provide daily lessons and more review.

The first book in the series is Fractions. Students should know how to add and subtract and have memorized their multiplication facts before beginning Fractions. Once they know their facts, they are ready to begin.

The author knows what he's doing and we plan to use the books through high school.

Don't buy here

By Virginia Delaney

Don't buy this book here. On Dr. Stanley's website, the first two books are only $19 each and the shipping is free.

Fantastic!

By Judith Finkell

I am eleven years old. My mom just got me Life of Fred Fractions. I absolutely love it! It actually makes math fun! I used to dread math. Now I want to do it all the time!
